Matt Casey is a trial lawyer with more than 20 years of experience defending businesses and individuals involved in high-value products liability, personal injury, and catastrophic injury disputes in Oregon. Matt is knowledgeable about the landscape in Oregon's various counties, and how injuries and claims are valued, having tried and arbitrated cases to conclusion throughout the state.

With a keen interest in how the human mind and body work, Matt enjoys resolving cases where it's important to understand the medical issues and the science behind what is required for recovery. Clients appreciate that Matt is a straight shooter who is skilled at identifying and explaining complex medical issues and legal concerns from the outset of the case and explaining them in ways that make sense. Since he started his legal career evaluating claims and medical issues on the plaintiff side, he brings a well-rounded perspective that helps him break down issues and arrive at common-sense solutions.

After looking at the big picture and doing an initial evaluation, Matt lays out a roadmap with different options early in the process so that his clients may make the best choices to chart an efficient course for the particular situation. This includes determining what types of experts are needed in the process to evaluate risk, and developing a defense plan with an end result in sight, all while helping clients understand what's going on with the case and making sure they feel comfortable with the process.
